HINTS TO HORSE BREEDERS

W. A. CRAFT

Animal Husbandry Department, Oklahoma A. and M. College

Although the breeding of horses is one of the oldest pursuits of man, exact knowledge of the behavior of characters in their inheritance is decidedly meager. It was not until the principles discovered by Mendel in 1865 were rediscovered in 1900 that animal breeding became a science. But the breeding of animals has been practiced for centuries as an art. Until recently, successful breeders were thought to possess secrets which guided them to their achievements, but critically conducted experiments with numerous species of animals and plants since 1900 have shown clearly that animal breeding is a science. This fact, however, does not diminish the art in animal improvement but it rather adds emphasis to the necessity for applying all of the skill one may acquire.

There are two adages which have come down from the past and both are of interest to the breeder of horses; the first is that no two individuals are alike; the second is that like begets like. The former simply means that variation is practically universal. Variation provides opportunity for the breeder to make selections. The latter is partly true also. Individual excellence is the result of both favorable inheritance and environment. Fortunately the breeding performance of animals of superior individual merit is on the whole more satisfactory than that of animals of inferior individual merit. This fact has been of great aid to the breeder who is a keen observer and a good judge.

Inheritance, as the term is used in animal breeding, refers to the germinal contribution which parents make to their offspring. The environment may affect the expression of certain hereditary traits but there are some traits which are not perceptibly affected by the environment. For example, size is a character which depends on the most favorable care for the maximum expression of the hereditary determiners for size.

Inheritance is governed by elements in the reproductive cells. These elements are now known as genes or determiners. The genes occur in pairs and one member of each pair is contributed by each parent. It is now known that inheritance is part by part. For example, one pair of genes may furnish the inherent basis for one trait or character and another pair may furnish the basis for another character. There are, however, some characters which are affected by several pairs of genes. Such characters show constant variation in expression. In some cases one member of a pair of genes is dominant over its mate which is recessive, but for other characters dominance is incomplete between the members of a pair of genes.

The behavior in inheritance of many characters has been experimentally determined for different species of animals and it is now known that when the mode of inheritance of a character is understood and the genetic make-up of a pair of animals is known with regard to a certain pair of genes the outcome of matings may be predicted with reasonable certainty. However, the livestock breeder must consider the animal as a whole. This means that he is not dealing with one pair of genes but hundreds of pairs. The inherent make-up of an animal consists actually of a sample of genes which is composed of two samples, one from each parent. The assortment of the genes appears to be a random process over which the breeder does not have control. Experience has shown, however, that inheritance may be guided by the breeder through critical selection of his breeding animals.

Since a stallion is used much more extensively than any one mare and, therefore, spreads his inheritance extensively it is particularly important that he be selected with a critical eye. Wherever possible to do so only purebred stallions should be used. Purebred animals have descended from a long line of selected ancestry and, therefore, should be more preponderant than grade stallions in stamping desirable character on their offspring. However, the breeder should demand that a purebred show an acceptable degree of individual excellence, since a registration certificate within itself has little or no virtue.

Experimental studies, dealing with inheritance in animals, have shown that many defects are recessive in inheritance. This means that certain matings may produce offspring with one or more defects which are not shown by either parent. Unfortunately it is next to impossible to get even one animal which possesses only genes for the character desired. The statement that "you cannot get all the good things in one horse" is heard often, and knowledge of the mode of inheritance of several characters in a species provides a clear understanding of this statement.

The exact mode of inheritance of very few characters is known for horses. The analysis of the inheritance of characters in farm animals must for the most part be made through carefully planned and diligently executed experimental study. Therefore, the task is one for the agricultural experiment station. Up to the present time exceedingly little experimental study has been given to inheritance in horses. To make an analysis of the inheritance of even those characters which follow the simplest mode of inheritance requires reasonably large numbers for a particular mating. Horses reproduce slowly. Therefore, many years are required to determine the manner of inheritance for a single character. Experiment stations have not been able to maintain herds of horses sufficiently large to make such studies possible.

Use has been made of stud books of the different breeds but these furnish data only on coat color. Herd book data are not satisfactory for the purpose of accurate analysis of the inheritance of coat color since the color of a colt at the time it is recorded may not be its color some time later. However, some information on the inheritance of coat color has been obtained from a study of the herd books.

Bay color appears to be dominant to black and black is dominant to chestnut or sorrel. Therefore, it is to be expected that some matings of bays will produce occasionally black, and others may produce a chestnut or sorrel now and then. Matings of blacks sometimes produce a chestnut, or sorrel which is commonly regarded as a chestnut. But matings of chestnut should produce only chestnut. The mating of black with chestnut often produces bay. This emphasizes the complex nature of the genes involved for coat color in horses.

Gray appears to be dominant to non-gray in horses but it does not usually show itself in the first coat of hair. White hairs begin to come in and mingle with the colored hairs after one or more coats have been shed. If the base color is black, an "iron gray" is produced, and if it is chestnut or sorrel a roan results. In some cases the animals finally become white after shedding a few coats, but white colts are exceedingly rare.

Spotting is of frequent occurrence in horses and apparently there are at least two distinctly different types. The more common form of spotting is the occurrence of a white spot or "star" in the forehead, which may extend to and include the nose. Frequently animals having a spot in the forehead also have one or more white feet. This type of spotting is characteristic of the Clydesdale and the Shire breeds of draft horses, and it sometimes appears in the Percheron. The white spotting observed on ponies which varies somewhat irregularly and results in pronounced spotting on the body is apparently of a different inherent nature.

The trotting gait appears to be dominant to pacing although careful training may develop the pace in a trotter, but the mating of two "natural born" pacers should produce a pacer.

It is hoped that in time the manner of inheritance may be determined for such traits as slope of pastern, size and shape of feet, angle of hock, setting of feet and legs, length of back, slope of croup, slope of shoulder, and shape of head. Although definite knowledge concerning the inheritance of these traits is lacking, there is abundant evidence that these traits are hereditary. Therefore, the breeder should continue to be critical whenever possible in his selecting of breeding stock and avoid the use of animals for breeding purposes which show a pronounced degree of defective conformation.

There is also evidence that the occurrence of many types of unsoundness is primarily due to inherent weakness. The evidence appears to justify the practice of choosing a stallion that is free from such traits as side bones, ring bones, bog and jack spavin.

The horse breeder well knows that clean horses of the desired draft type are those which are in greatest demand at all times and that such horses command a premium on the market. It appears to be a certainty that if the level of the quality of horses produced in Oklahoma is to be raised, those who stand stallions must be critical in their selections.

FEEDING AND CARE OF HORSES

L. E. HAWKINS

Assistant Professor of Animal Husbandry
Oklahoma A. and M. College

The most advisable practices to follow in feeding and care of horses will depend upon local conditions such as available kinds of feed, equipment already at hand, and individual characteristics of the horses which are to be handled. Certain principles or general practices may be outlined, however, which can be applied to the conditions which exist in Oklahoma and surrounding states.

THE STALLION

One of the most satisfactory rations which can be fed to the stallion in Oklahoma and other parts of the Southwest consists of whole oats, wheat bran, and prairie hay, with very little if any alfalfa hay.

Whole oats are a most excellent grain for horses of all kinds and ages. Oats are the best grain that can be had for the breeding stallion. Other grains such as corn and the grain sorghums are so inferior to oats that they will be discussed with reluctance. Oats are properly balanced as to protein and carbohydrate content, are rather bulky which is desirable, are quite free from fats and oils, and are very palatable to the horse. They are less "heating" than the other grains. Oats may be fed crushed or uncrushed. It is doubtful whether the grinding of oats for horses of all kinds, including the stallion, is necessary except when used as a part of a mixed ration.

Prairie hay is the most satisfactory roughage for the stallion. It is very palatable to horses, is quite nutritious, and never causes bloat nor colic. A small quantity of good quality alfalfa hay may be added to prairie hay for the stallion, particularly if pasture is not available. However, green pasture of some sort should be provided if at all practicable.

Wheat bran is higher in protein content than grains or prairie hay, and is very similar to alfalfa hay in this respect. A small amount of wheat bran will improve a ration of oats and prairie hay by supplying more protein and mineral. Wheat bran is higher than most feeds in phosphorus, particularly. Care must be taken to avoid moldy or musty bran.

In case corn or a grain sorghum is fed to the stallion as the principal grain, a little more wheat bran will be required to supply needed protein. A very small quantity, not over two pounds per head daily, of cottonseed meal or linseed oil meal may be fed to balance corn or grain sorghum and prairie hay if no oats nor wheat bran are available. Too little is known about these feeds for the stallion to accept them without caution, however. The important point is that corn, the grain sorghums and prairie hay are too low in protein content to produce best results, and some kind of protein supplement should be added to these feeds. Barley may be used as a grain for the stallion in case oats are not available, a condition which is not likely to occur since oats may be had more readily than barley in most localities. The protein content of barley is midway between that of oats and of corn.

Cane, grain sorghums, or sudan grass hay may be fed to the stallion. These hays, like prairie hay, are low in protein content and additional protein should be used to supplement them.

The quantity of feed which the stallion should receive and the frequency of feeding vary with the size and appetite of the horse and the amount of exercise which he takes. A stallion which works in harness requires more feed than one which gets less exercise. The best rule to follow is to feed the horse all the hay he will take and add such grain as is necessary to keep him in the desired condition of flesh and growth. A young stallion should be kept growing well until he is four or five years of age. A good rate of growth is two pounds of gain in live weight per day. Mature stallions which do not work in harness do well on two feeds of grain per day if they have hay at all times. Young stallions and those which work in harness require grain three times a day for best results.

Use of a stallion for breeding service may begin when he is two years of age, but he should serve no more than some twenty mares at that age. Two services a week are about right for a two-year-old horse. Forty to fifty mares, if they are well distributed, can be handled by a three-year-old stallion in a season without injury. A four-year-old horse can take care of seventy to eighty mares in a season, while a stallion five years old or older may be expected to breed ninety to a hundred mares if they are well distributed over the breeding season. It is assumed that the stallion does little or no work in the harness if he is to perform heavy breeding service. Even a mature stallion should rarely, if ever, perform more than two services in one day, and many are unable to successfully continue at that rate every day for many weeks at a time.

All breeding stallions should be given some exercise every day. The optimum amount of exercise will vary according to the individual horse and the breeding service which he is called upon to perform. Draft stallions which are maintained under farm conditions where the number of mares to be bred is not up toward the maximum may well be used in harness for general farm work. Such work is to be recommended from the standpoint of health of the horse and economy to the owner. If the stallion is not worked in the harness he may be allowed to run in a lot some three hundred feet in length for two to five hours each day. A long, narrow lot is better than a shorter one because the horse will exercise more if he can travel farther in one direction. The other commonly used method of exercise is to travel the horse on the road under the saddle, hitched to a cart, or by leading him.

Some stallions seem to require but little exercise to keep in good breeding condition, while others are more certain breeders if they are worked out rather thoroughly every day. As little as two or three miles of walking a day is found to be best for some breeding stallions. Specific recommendation as to exercise can not be made for all stallions due to such variability. Some horses work best and are most successful in service when they are given exercise for a few minutes to an hour just prior to service. Also some horses perform better service if used within two or three hours after a preceding service than if several hours elapse between services. Such frequent services cannot be performed for any considerable number of days, however, without adequate periods of rest.

THE MARE

Feed requirements of the mare are such that oats and prairie hay may constitute the greater portion of her ration, just as these feeds make up the major portion of the stallion's ration. Green pasture is essential to satisfactory maintenance of the breeding mare, also.

The foregoing discussion of the various grains and roughages for the stallion applies to the mare as well. The principal difference in nutritional requirements of the mare and stallion is due to the more strenuous exercise which the mare receives, and the fact that green pasture is provided for her, usually. Mares commonly are worked in harness after they have attained a working age, and are allowed the run of the field or pasture when not in the harness. As a consequence they require feeds which will yield more energy than is needed by the stallion if he is confined to close quarters. Although oats are an excellent grain for the mare it is advisable to include some corn or grain sorghum in her ration if she is doing heavy work. Also she can handle more alfalfa hay than the horse which receives only limited exercise.

The pregnant mare's feed requirements are not greatly different from those of the open mare provided they are doing similar work and neither is nursing a foal. The appetite and condition of the mare should be the guiding factors in determining the quantity of feed which she receives. It is important that the pregnant mare has access to mineral at all times. A mixture of equal parts of finely ground limestone, steamed bone meal, and common salt may be kept before her in an open salt box, or three ounces daily of this mixture may be supplied in her feed. Salt should be supplied in a separate box or in block form.

The oestrous cycle or length of time between the onset of one period of heat until the beginning of the next heat has been variously reported as twenty-one to twenty-eight days in the mare. The actual period of heat or time when the mare will accept the stallion varies from two to eight or nine days in different mares, but is about the same at different heat periods in the same mare. The latest information indicates that the chances of a successful mating are greatest when the mare is bred toward the latter part of the heat. However, it is very difficult to detect the beginning of heat in some mares unless a stallion is available for trying them, and it is equally hard to predict when the mare will go out of heat. The variation among mares in length of heat period adds to the uncertainty. Careful observation of a mare as to evidences of heat which she usually shows and the length of the heat period which seems to be characteristic of her should be made by the owner or attendant in order to best know when to breed the mare. The usual instruction to the mare owner is to bring the mare back for trial twenty-one days after the day of breeding.

It would seem that twenty-two or twenty-three days later would be equally satisfactory since the entire oestrous cycle exceeds twenty-one days in most mares.

THE MARE IN FOAL

The mare which is heavy in foal should continue to receive the kind of feed to which she is accustomed, and the feed need not be reduced greatly until the time of foaling. An exception would be a case where the mare is heavily stocked up in her legs, when it would be well to reduce the feed somewhat. Very little feed is necessary for twenty-four to forty-eight hours after foaling and the feed may be increased slowly from a small quantity to a full feed when the foal is old enough to handle a full flow of milk.

Liberal feeding of the mare while she is nursing the foal is essential to maintain fair condition in the mare and to keep up a good milk flow. Mineral needs of the mare should receive close attention at that time because the heaviest draft upon her body for minerals occurs then. The foal should begin to receive grain at a few weeks of age in order to add to his growth and save the mare.

A clean lot or open pasture is the best place for foaling the colt. The mare should be made to foal in the barn only in case of extremely bad weather. Danger of infection is too great around the barn. The foal's navel should be treated with tincture of iodine solution as soon as possible after foaling to reduce the chances of navel ill. It is well for an attendant to be present if possible when the mare foals but assistance should be rendered only in case of very evident need. The inexperienced person is more apt to be hasty than too slow in offering assistance. It must be remembered that the mare's muscles in the pelvic region must undergo much relaxation to permit normal delivery of the foal, and this usually is accomplished after labor has progressed for considerable length of time.

ARTIFICIAL INSEMINATION

DR. C. H. McELROY

Department of Veterinary Science

The use in horse breeding of the impregnator, or other artificial means of introducing semen, has passed the experimental stage. Its practical use has been thoroughly demonstrated as a satisfactory means of breeding mares that have been considered difficult or even impossible to breed by direct service, and also as a means of breeding several mares at one service of the stallion. This method when carried out will protect the stallion and give semen of greater fertilizing power than could be had from a stallion that is used for service daily.

While many are interested in the scientific questions relating to breeding and would like to understand the underlying principles and laws governing these matters, more are interested in the practical application of the laws and appreciate to the fullest extent information that will enable them to apply whatever knowledge may be gained by investigations of this character.

There is generally a dread on the part of most people in undertaking anything new. Since there is nothing about the anatomy of the reproductive organs of the mare or the stallion that is difficult to understand, and the necessary instruments to be used in artificial insemination are few and simple, there seems no reason, as far as the operation is concerned, why every breeder should not practice this method in horse breeding.
